Text:

In Britain, before the internet people used to listen to the news on the radio as they got up. Then , they read a newspaper in the morning on the train while travelling to work. On the way home, they may even buy another newspaper – an evening newspaper, possibly or a local one. Also, they used to watch the news on television at six o'clock before going to bed. At the weekend, they had the big Sunday papers. Yes, before the internet, there were easy, separate categories of time. Radio, newspapers and television all had a place.

Then things became a bit more complicated. First 24 hours TV news arrived, and then the internet. Now, people can get the news when they want rather than waiting for other people to decide what to tell them and when.
