Child labour

Child labour is a global issue that affects millions of children, especially in developing countries. Child labour occurs when children are forced to work at a young age, often in risky or unhealthy conditions, which prevents them from going to school and enjoying their childhood. Many children work in factories, mines, or on farms where they perform difficult tasks for very low wages.

The causes of child labour are complex. Poverty is one of the main reasons, as many families cannot afford basic necessities, so children must work to help support their families. Lack of education also contributes to child labour, as children without access to schooling are more likely to be employed in low-paying jobs.

Various organizations, such as UNICEF and the International Labour Organization (ILO), work to combat child labour. They promote laws that protect children's rights and help provide education and support to children in need. International cooperation and strong local laws are essential to protect children from exploitation and to ensure a better future for them.

Ending child labour is challenging, but it is necessary to create a world where all children can grow up safe, healthy, and educated.
