First Term English Test

A kickback is an illegal payment intended as compensation for preferential treatment or any other type of improper service received. The kickback may be money, a gift, credit, or anything of value. Paying or receiving kickbacks is a corrupt practice since it interferes with an employee's or a public official's ability to make fair decisions. Kickbacks are often considered a type of bribery.

Kickbacks can take many forms but they all involve some sort of secret agreement between two sides. An example of a kickback is a government employee who's responsible for managing a project may receive a kickback for choosing one contractor over another. This may result in a better-qualified contractor not winning the contract.

Kickbacks increase the cost of doing business in countries around the world. They also form the basis for much of the world's government corruption. Companies that are looking to supply products or services to countries known for corruption may find that they have to pay numerous officials to be considered for a contract.

Employees engage in kickbacks for several reasons. The belief that a kickback operation will go unpunished or that punishment will be light is a primary driver for officials who are willing to take bribes. They may be poorly paid and see kickbacks as a way to supplement their low salary.
