Second Term Exam

PART ONE: READING

The vital role of school

Today, in developed nations, schools no longer represent the only source where the young can have access to knowledge. With progress of technology, the opportunities to acquire learning have widened considerably. The chances for all to extend their understanding in various topics are available outside the pedagogical institutions. They are provided through a multitude of resources such as television channels, mass media, public libraries and above all internet sites. Among their advantages we find not only immense treasures of updates facts but also the possibility to benefit from their services at a relatively low cost.

However, despite the competition they face, schools offer exceptional assets in many areas and still remain an ideal environment for the acquisition of the qualities that pupils must gradually cultivate through their evolution into adults. It is in contact with their classmates that the young succeed in learning how to behave inside their groups and the manners to adopt to get integrated in them. It is only when they are supervised by their teachers that they discover their true capacities and whether or not they are making progress. For many of them the classroom acts as a real life context where they have the possibility to measure themselves with others in every aspect and where they get motivated so as to become better than their peers.

Whatever the useful facts when we obtain through television and internet, these means cannot vie with schools in shaping the personality of the learners. These last find in the school a matchless atmosphere to get acquainted with challenges with all sorts. This situation prompts them to fight back and release enough energy to surmount the obstacles they meet. Little by little they succeed in becoming more organised in their work and more perseverant in their efforts. It is also in such a frame that they get familiar with the rules and taught to respect them for the good of all. Tolerance and rational thinking are incorporated in their mind so that they get later mature enough for life.
